

A quick guide: Accessible Information Regulations

The Public Service Vehicles Accessible Information Regulations will make it easier for passengers to access information about their journey while travelling by bus.

The Regulations are being phased in from 2023 to 2031 and apply to local journeys in England, Scotland and Wales. They do not apply to closed-door school services or vehicles designed to carry fewer than 17 people.

Here's a quick guide to what this will mean for your journey.

Information

Information must be made available directly to passengers in audio and visual form and not through a phone or mobile device.

It must include:

- the route of the vehicle and direction of travel
- stopping places on the route
- diversion alerts
- whether the vehicle is being used on a hail and ride route
- a notification that the vehicle has reached its final destination.

Audio and visual information must be consistent.

Audio

Announcements must be audible to passengers in any seat or wheelchair space on the bus, and to a hearing-impaired person using a hearing aid when sitting in a priority seat or wheelchair space

They must be given at every stop as soon as the doors open and give passengers plenty of time to prepare to disembark.

Diversions should be announced at the approach to the last scheduled stop, or as soon as the diversion is clear and there should be an alert tone ahead of diversions and final stop announcements.

Adaptive volume control is not currently mandatory but operators are required to measure the ambient noise of each vehicle and ensure announcements are at least 3 decibels louder.

Visual

Visual information should be clearly seen by at least 51% of passengers on each deck and to anyone in a priority seat or wheelchair space. It is accepted that standing passengers may obscure the view.

All visual information should be clear with characters at least 22mm high and no words in capital letters only.
